UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE
Faculty of Mathematics

NRICH's free K-12 math activities require kids to use mathematical thinking; this type of problem solving can take a while, so encourage kids to stick with it. For math-anxious grown-ups, there are solutions and plenty of tips in NRICH's parent-friendly teaching area. Funded by England's University of Cambridge, NRICH is geared toward a British curriculum; however, grade level info is given for all learners. Some problems are wordy but parents can print the pages and/or read them aloud if necessary.

Who should try this?

- Kids from Nursery to Year 13 whose palms sweat over speed drills may welcome the slower pace and creativity required to solve problems on NRICH. (It's solid for kids who are master at those drills, too.)
- They can engage deeply with innovative "Live" problems that make math both social and conceptual; kids can work together on solutions and must recognize there are multiple ways to get the same result.
- There are projects too and a special section of activities that support STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math) education.
- The site's assortment of math content and its support for parents have earned several well-deserved educational endorsements in the United Kingdom.

 Happy women's day to all the amazing women in the world like my mom my sisters and the amazing teachers at our school who educate us for us to have a bright future.
 My favorite teacher has to be Ms. Jayasree our amazing form tutor and ICT teacher she always gives us the support we need and even if we get something wrong in an answer for a task she always helps us to correct them and even explains it again if we need to, she treats everyone equally in the class and no student is different for her she supports us all no matter how hard it gets and that is the same will all our other amazing teachers who teach our class.
